“It isn't easy being in the center of a black void”, said The Hub Keeper. “You are surrounded by potential worlds, one's that I am not allowed to enter, as I am required to stay put. Such a lonely existence...”

“Sir, are you alright?”, a little boy asked. As he looked at The Hub Keeper, he noticed that he wasn't changing his sight to the boy. “Sir...”

“I will tell you my story, if you will promise me one thing.”, The boy thought about it, and wondered what The Hub Keeper wanted from him. “Promise me that you will make something of yourself.” The little boy sighed with relief, and he looked down at the central hub floor.

“I promise. I will listen to your story, and I will take your advice very kindly, sir.”

“I, am The Hub Keeper, my name does not matter.”

The little boy interrupts, “Your name, um, does matter, sir.”

“Would you stop referring to me as 'Sir?!’” The Hub Keeper shouted out really loud. He looked down at the frightened boy. “I'm sorry. I have grown weary of watching the portals swirl, and not being able to enter them. My name,” The Hub Keeper paused. “my name is simply Kheeper.” Kheeper smiled, much to his slight delight, and with his high hopes for the little boy.
